The Tory manifesto which looks likely to be introduced in a landslide victory means you will have to pay for all of your care costs if you have assets over £100k

It's being called – THE DEMENTIA TAX!

So

It means the following:

When you enter care OR now have care provided at home they will add all your assets up and this will produce a figure

Deduct £100k

That's the maximum fee your care will cost – there is going to be a cap on this, but the Tories have not told us what this will be.

If you have a £250k property and £50k savings for example

Your maximum fee would be £200k (up to whatever cap the Tories decide to put on it £100k, £150k, the whole £200k – who knows?)

At £1k a week that's just under 4 years care

So for many this will be a real possibility as we are all living longer

When you die your executors will be forced to sell your property to pay the Government their money which could be up to the whole £200k

£100k would then be left to distribute to your beneficiaries

On the other hand:

If that property had been legally placed in Trust well before care was a consideration

When the local authority conducted their assessment the property would have to be disregarded as it would not be solely owned by the person going into care
£50k of savings would then be below the £100k threshold

And as a result NO loss of assets whatsoever would be experienced

Which would you prefer?

If EVER there was a time to put in legal Trust protection for your property

Surely it HAS to be now

Thy Will Be done are and have ALWAYS been ahead of the game where protection of property is concerned
